But their reverie is shattered with the arrival of Dame, who has toughened himself in prison in every way and now seeks the boxing glory he believes is his due. There's a certain geeky glee in witnessing the spectacle of Kang vs. Killmonger, given the significant villainous presence both actors have had within the Marvel Cinematic Universe. Majors, as always, is tremendous. He brings a deeply unsettling energy to the role—there's something volatile about Dame beneath his seemingly placid exterior. The fact that he isn't obviously raging all the time is what makes him scarier: He's watching, plotting, seething, but his imposing physicality ultimately makes him ferocious. Working with cinematographer Kramer Morgenthau and editors Jessica Baclesse and Tyler Nelson, Jordan the director takes a seemingly simple scene in which Adonis and Damian share an awkward reunion dinner and tells a full, rich story with it. The close-ups, the pacing, the decision to hold on an actor's face for a beat or two longer than expected—they all convey so much meaning and subtext. The exchange is powerful for what it doesn't show—for what these characters don't tell us, for what they hold back strategically but we can sense, nonetheless. But "Creed III" also gives the people what they want, and that is: multiple training montages. As they sing in "Team America: World Police," "Even 'Rocky' had a montage." Once it becomes clear that Donnie must get back into shape to fight Dame for the championship—at Dodger Stadium, of all places, a truly inspired location that's so extremely L.A.—the screenplay from Keenan Coogler (Ryan's brother) and Zach Baylin ("King Richard") hits all the uplifting beats you'd expect, but tosses in some clever new ones, too. So yes, there's running through the streets, on the beach, up a hill. There's punching and sparring. But also: the sight of Adonis pulling an actual airplane through the sheer power of his pectorals. It's kind of hilarious, but also wildly entertaining.
